The importance of being Polish in old neighborhood
Letters from the past

Early in the 20th century, new immigrants found themselves under pressure to abandon their ethnic roots and demonstrate loyalty to America. Parents often ordered children not to speak the language of the old country in the home.

This was anything but the case with Milwaukee's Polish community that lived in the Park Neighborhoods.

Letter reveals much

In 1907, Michael Kruszka, editor of the Kuryer Polski, a large Polish language newspaper published in Milwaukee, wrote a letter to the local archbishop, S.G. Messmer. In the letter, Kruszka accused the archbishop of trying to destroy the reputation of his family through a newspaper he helped organize, the Nowiny, another Polish language paper published in Milwaukee.

Kruszka, through the Kuryer, had been accusing the archdiocese for years of denying Polish priests the opportunity to advance in the Church. Now he claimed that the Archbishop was using the Nowiny to discredit him and his family.

How was the Archbishop trying to discredit the family? According to Kruszka, a major strategy was insinuating that the family did not truly value its Polish heritage.

Excerpts from the letter

One of the accusations Kruszka made is that the Nowiny was falsely reporting that Kruszka’s daughter was going to Downer College, which was non-Polish and Protestant, and that the daughter barely spoke Polish. To this, Kruszka responded that his daughter was too unhealthy to board at an out-of-state Polish Catholic College.

“Although my daughter has attended mostly non-sectarian schools,” argued Kruszka, “she speaks and writes better Polish than any graduate of any sectarian school or college in this country.” He claimed that the false information “will cause a social ostracism of her among the Polish people, will ruin her whole future.”

Kruszka also claimed the Nowiny had accused him of being “anti-Catholic,” and accused his brother, Father Wacław Kruszka of working against the Church. Of his brother, Michael Kruszka wrote the following: “He is a truly Catholic priest, the most faithful believer in the Catholic Church, the most true proponent of true Catholic-Christian policy.

“The only ‘wrong’ which he committed is that he ‘dared’ to go to Rome and petition the Pope for the Polish people, and even that he did after being asked by the Polish clergy and the Polish people to do so; and that he ‘dared’ to criticize certain persecutions of Poles by their bishops...”
